Captured Jewish civilians who participated in Jewish ghetto uprisings in Warsaw are marched out of the city by Nazi troops in 1943

FREDERIC LEWIS

Taking action against extermination of Jews - 1943

A PACKED audience at the Cambridge Guildhall gave unanimous support to a resolution to the government to take all action in fighting the Nazi party's extermination of the Jews in Europe.

A resolution associating themselves with the feelings of horror and indignation expressed by the allied nations in the Nazi policy of extermination of the Jews in occupied Europe was passed.

In spite of the terrible bestialities that were being perpetrated upon them, the Jews would not cry out for revenge but would expect justice. The criminals must be published in order to prevent similar crimes in the future.

A Jewish member of the Polish national council said the Jews would survive their present suffering. There would come a time when eye witness documents of mass murders and bestiality would find a place on the table of the nations' courts of justice.

The Jews had earned the right to demand action and wished to live in Palestine as free human beings and as a free community.

The final speaker made it clear that the persecution of the Jews was only the larger part of a persecution against all subjected nations. The suffering of the Jews was only greater numerically.

Dealing with anti-Semitism, in all cases Germany was at the root of it, and it was Nazi money that sponsored such movements. He also answered those who constantly stated that it was the Jews who operated the whole of the black market.

Fire in Waterbeach - village with no fire brigade - 1900

A FIRE occurred in the shop used as a general stores for the grocery and drapery business of Mr R A Waddelow of Waterbeach.

An assistant, Mr Albert Denson, slept upon the premises and was awakened by a choking sensation.

Fortunately, there was a pump and a supply of pails handy and two young men, one with no shoes on and the other in his socks, commenced pouring water through the window on to the burning material underneath.

For a quarter of an hour they laboured with a will before assistance was forthcoming.

There is no organised fire brigade in the village, but there is a fire engine which was out of order at the time of the outbreak.
